Why I Chose This Solo Date

For months, I'd been telling myself the same thing: "When my client launches are finished and my condo rebuild is complete, I'll finally take a little getaway."

One problem.
Life kept moving the finish line.

The condo was finally finished. Work projects were still dragging on. And eventually I realized I didn't actually need a vacation.

I just needed a break. So instead of waiting for the perfect weekend to appear, I decided to create one.

I'd looked at ResortPass before but had never actually booked a day pass. After comparing a few local options, SkyBeach felt like the right fit.

Close to home. Reasonably priced. On the water. Easy. Sometimes easy is exactly what you need.

My Day at SkyBeach Resort

I arrived around 10:30 a.m., parked, checked in, and received my wristband. The whole process took just a few minutes.

There was a Paradeco Coffee Roasters on-site, but I'd already had my morning coffee, so I went straight to the day's biggest decision.

Pool or beach? Beach won.

I opened my book and spent the next hour reading, people-watching, and doing something I don't do nearly enough: Nothing.

Eventually, a Blueberry Spritz from the SkyBar found its way into my hand.
And perhaps another.

At lunchtime, I wandered upstairs for chicken tacos and a view of the water while live music drifted up from below.

No schedule.

No rushing.

No expectations

The afternoon simply unfolded.

And somehow, even though I was only about ten minutes from home, it genuinely felt like I'd gone somewhere.

What Was It Really Like?

Before I went, I wondered whether spending an entire resort day alone might feel a little awkward.

Would everyone else be couples or families? Would sitting by myself make me feel conspicuous?

It didn't.

People were reading, swimming, eating, listening to music, napping, and generally doing their own thing.

I also noticed several other day-pass guests, including a woman at the bar who told me her family does this regularly.

That was when I realized a daycation isn't necessarily a special-occasion experience. It can simply be an easy way to change the scenery for a day.

And because everything you need is already there, there's very little planning involved.

💛 Favorite Moment

Settling into a beach chair with my book and realizing that, for the next several hours, I didn't have anywhere else I needed to be.

Ten minutes from home somehow felt like a getaway.
